Visit Wawell Cathedral and St. Mary's Cathedral with a private guide and check out some of the most interesting Catholic churches in Krakow. Admire the baroque façade of St. Anne's Church, discover one of the oldest churches in Krakow's Old Town, and learn about the poor Sister Claire in the city's convent. Pass through Wawell Royal Castle, climb the bell tower of Wawell Cathedral and complete a treble private tour. Better, enjoy personalized commentary in your personal guide. Meet a private guide at a hotel in the heart of Krakow, take a stroll through Krakow's Old Town and talk about your journey. If you really want to see anything, let your guide know. The best thing about having a personal guide is that the commentary can be tailored to the things of interest most: it is the religious history of the church or perhaps its own architecture and works. Most tours are on foot, but are included if you need to use a public transport ticket. The first stop is outside the ornate church in St Anne, one of Poland's most beautiful Baroque churches. Learn about its history and cross line the Linek Groumey to Visit St Mary's Cathedral. Continue to the iconic German sculptor Veit Stoss. Continue to St Adalbert Church (aka St. Wawel Church), head to St. Francis Church, one of the oldest churches in Krakow's Old Town, and admire the towering Gothic altar to see stained glass windows and corridors. The palace of the bishop sat next, so your camera is ready to capture a snap of the so-called Pope window. Pope John Paul II addressed his followers in Krakow. You can hear the popular Pope's story as you walk through St. Peter's and Paul's church. While posing for a photo in front of a baroque façade, learn about a group of nuns known as the poor Sister Claire in a nearby convent. Finally, stroll down the hill, admire Wawell Royal Castle and visit Wawell Cathedral. Listen to the castle's past and secrets and climb up to the cathedral's Sigismund Bell. The path to the bell tower takes about 70 steps. If you don't want to climb, take the time to explore the cathedral. After three hours, a private tour begins from the city centre to the hotel by nearby public transport. Ask your guide for guidance. I think it's different for my parents. We need to protect our children. That's our No.1 call for life, and it all comes before you. Pew and stained glass windows in the church. (Monash Franz/ Getty) For decades, the Catholic Church has been in the midst of a crisis, one of which has shocked thousands of people, and one of the oldest institutions in the world is struggling to find a way forward. At the end of February, the Vatican held a large-scale meeting on the sexual abuse crisis, a revelation of decades of abuse. World, Children, Adult Seminary, Nuns. At the meeting, Pope Francis wrote that although Atlantic reporter Rachel Donadio called for concrete changes, the conference as a whole appeared to be a zero-tolerance ceremonial exercise that many victims in the United States have demanded from priests who use their power to abuse. The crisis is likely to continue as the church's top authorities continue to make slow-moving calculations. The institutional crisis for the Church is a personal crisis for the faithful. Lay Catholics should consider what this crisis means to them, their families, and their faith. Parents in particular often feel seriously conflicted. Why don't you worry about sending your child to the altar server after reading the altar server using the altar server in the past? At the same time, devout parents who love the Church deeply naturally want their children to receive spiritual benefits. What should they do? Some decide that they cannot reconcile faith with decades of abuse and subsequent cover-ups, or that the best way to protect their children is to leave the Church. Laura Donovan, 30, says the child sexual abuse crisis is why she broke up with the Catholic Church. Donovan, a Los Angeles-based social media manager, was somewhat away from Catholic parenting when the Boston Globe revealed the extent of the Catholic Church's cover-up of child abuse in the Boston area in 2002, but when she learned how prevalent the problem was, she ultimately felt that I didn't want to go back to the Catholic Church. I don't want to raise children in that religion. A Pennsylvania grand jury report that revealed that more than 300 priests had been abused for 70 years came out in August last year, around the time Donovan's first child, son, was born. After becoming a parent, Donovan called back to Christianity and wanted to raise a family in the Church, but she and her husband told him not to raise him as a Catholic. I don't necessarily think anything will happen to him, she says. I mean, I can. But I'm just thinking, what would he think of us if we brought him to that church even after all this unfolded? ... When he grew up Catholic and learned about sexual abuse around the world that had been covered up for decades, he came to us and said, 'How could I raise me in that religion?' I will not answer for him. Eventually, Donovan's son was baptized at the Lutheran Church, and Donovan himself was identified. Her husband attended Lutheran Church, and when Donovan first attended with him, she says, 'I felt really comfortable there. It had many elements of what I like about the Catholic Church - it's been long, it's structured, but it's There is definitely a big scandal. Nevertheless, she misses some of the Catholic traditions, such as singing, rosary beads, displays of the congregation of peace, praying to the Saints and thinking about angels. Today, when Donovan prays, she has a hard time instinctively not marking the cross. It is difficult to know how many people have left the Catholic Church as a direct result of the sexual abuse crisis. According to the Pew Research Center, the Catholic Church across the United States is losing membership at a faster rate than any other religion, with more than six former Catholics in all converts as of 2015. (The second fastest declining religion in the United States was a major Protestant religion, with 1.7 former congregations for all new members.) From 2010 to 2016, the percentage of American adults who describe themselves as Catholic fell from 25.2 percent to 23.5 percent. While it is unclear whether Catholics are the main reason for leaving the Church, a 2016 Public Religion Institute report shows that people who grew up as Catholics characterize their departure as a direct result of negative religious treatment of gays and lesbians and/or clergy sexual abuse scandals than those raised in other religious traditions. Other Catholic parents are troubled by previous reports of Pennsylvania revelations and crises, but are dedicated to the Church. It didn't change the daily practices of faith, and I didn't know what I could do. Kendra Tierney, a 42-year-old writer and mother who has nine children between the ages of 1 and 16, says: 'If you believe that the Catholic Church is founded by Jesus Christ, then there is nowhere to go. I asked Jesus Peter, 'Will I leave?' and Peter asked, 'Who should I go to?' That's how I feel. Tierney grew up as a Catholic, and after becoming a mother, his faith deepened as he began to form a family life around the precedent. It was inspired by her blog Catholic all year round. She says she didn't pay much attention to the news when the Boston Globe investigation came out in 2002, so for me, the first big punch of intuition was late last summer, when the [Pennsylvania] report came out. She saw the abuse as a failure of personal holiness and sat down and said, 'This is a terrible thing. This is a threat to my children and my faith. She wanted to do something in response to the news. Tierney, along with others in the Catholic community, launched a month-long campaign to proclaim prayer, fasting, and sacrifice, reimbursing God for the sins of abusive priests and bishops who concealed their actions. During the month of September, she says, our family observed some sort of Lent. We gave up all snacks, desserts, sodas, all TV and video games and added something special. Reparations prayers for priests in the book Shinnu Jesu. If we are all sinners, and we can develop as members of the body of Christ, if we can raise a holy son and daughter, it will help the Church. In New York City, a 35-year-old Catholic father seems to have been torn between raising a holy daughter and protecting her. (This person asked me to remain anonymous because I was concerned that if I worked in a Catholic organization and spoke freely about the Church, I might have consequences at work.) He grew up in a Hispanic Catholic family, attended Catholic schools for secondary school, and although he didn't attend much in college, he reportedly became closer to the Church after meeting his wife. She was much more devout than I was, he says. The man says that he and his wife have not yet discussed raising a daughter in the church in light of the sexual abuse crisis. We were just paralyzed. Besides, with the stress of parenting as a two-year-old, the family didn't have much time to go to church anyway. But I'm not going to deny that that this is a real nuisance to all this news that continues to emerge. A few days after the Pennsylvania report was published, he posted on the Catholic subreddit asking if it makes sense to watch out for priests with very poor social skills or seemingly awkward priests. In the answer, some people mocked him by saying that being awkward doesn't mean he's a predator, but if someone looks away from him, he still feels he should trust his intuition. He said he thinks different parents are different. We need to protect our children. It's our No.1 call in life, and it all comes before you. You don't worry about church or school. Nevertheless, he still sends his daughter to Catholic school, hoping that the Church will be a part of her life in some way. [Catholics] are encircled by identity for many Hispanics, he says. My daughter wants to find her own way, but there is still a place in my heart where I want her to be a part of her faith. There is a lot of beauty in the church. Even if you want to see Christ as a historical figure, it is a great model of how people should treat others. Among families still part of the Catholic Church, some parents began to reconsider the degree to which their children participated in the Church community. For example, a Catholic father in New York City said his daughter would never feel comfortable being alone in church without her parents. After a Pennsylvania grand jury report in 2018, Chris Damian, an author and lawyer based in Twin Cities, Minnesota, co-founded YRespond, a group that organizes events for young Catholic adults. Gather together to discuss the church's crisis. More than 100 attendees gathered in the basement of the Minneapolis Church to express their feelings of worry, disillusionment, anger, and sadness. According to Damian's blog, one attendee said there was no way my child could be an altar server. Kirby Hoberg, 28, a blogger, actress and mother of three who helps organize YRespond and organize meetings, says it's understandable, especially given that the altar server has historically spent more time with priests than having other children in the congregation. I hear a lot, and I see why people do so. Hoberg says. A dose of caution is enough to make some Catholic parents comfortable with their children participating in church activities. For example, Chris Meyer's 12-year-old son is not only an altar server, but also knows how to offer Mass in Latin, which is very much in demand in Utah. Meyers-Chris, his wife, and their seven children (some of them adults) wandered around in good quantities because Chris had been in the Air Force for a while. At each place where they lived, they examined the churches and priests - parish shopping, as he says - before settling with the congregation. We have become very selective about which priests we will be around and which priests will be with our children. Wherever we were, we were close to the priests. We are through them for dinner. You can get a sense when things don't work well for the priest. But we did not put the children alone with the priest or in a situation where they could compromise. The way the priest says Mass is a clue to Meyer's character, which serves as a question of whether Meyer trusts him. At the first church, the family went to Utah, and the priest just skipped the main part of the Mass, he says. That was putting us off. One of the things we're looking for is when they do things the way they need to be. In other words, they are obedient - it probably means obedience to their vows. When they just start to wing it, it means that they see themselves as their authority, and I don't think it's healthy. Of course, many Catholic parents still trust the parish and priests, despite their disappointment at how the scandal reflects the Church as an institution. They say that their church has a policy of routine audits, education for adult volunteers, and a policy that prohibits priests from being alone with children. Some Catholic parents said their priests were willing to discuss the issue openly and share their grief, and Church leaders were willing to engage with parishioners in discussions about how to make the Catholic Church a safer place. Others emphasize that the majority of priests are morally sound leaders and have been accused of inappropriate behavior. But The biggest change of earlier times when some of the abuse described in the Boston and Pennsylvania reports occurred, for some of today's Catholic families, priests are not put on a pedestal. Some of the parents we spoke to for this work said that priests cannot be wrong or more corrupt than ordinary people, and that there is less sense among Catholics today than in the past few decades. So they teach the children to beware of inappropriate behavior that includes all adults, priests, and other spiritual leaders. We want our children to respect authoritative people, but by over-emphasizing respect for the clergy, this culture of abuse has been able to persist in the shadows. Tierney says. They are not superheroes. They are human beings. We can all sin, and that's the conversation I had with the children. You trust your intuition, and if something is wrong, it probably won't. We don't treat priests differently than others, but we are very careful about leaving our children alone with anyone. Haley Haley, a 33-year-old mother of four from Waco, Texas, and Haley Stewart, the author behind Michael Mas's Catholic blog Carrot, say. Her children are 7 months, 5, 7, 10, and she says she has talked with them about physical autonomy since childhood. We teach our children the anatomical names of body parts, so we're really young, 'this part of the body is not something that anyone else touches', she says. It doesn't have to be a big scary conversation with a young child. Also impress them that if someone is doing something on your body that you don't like, it's not your fault and we have to tell mom and dad to make sure you're safe from that person. Kirby Hoberg noticed that young Catholic parents she knew seemed more upset about the recent wave of sexual abuse revelations than older parents who knew she was an adult in the first phase of the crisis, in 2002. I think I was 12 years old when the news started to break. We saw things like the Dallas Charter and believed that things were actually being handled. I think people older than me feel very helpless. Like, 'I've tried it once, and now it's gone.' Hoberg expects Catholic parents of his generation to be considered the aftermath of the sexual abuse crisis over the next few years. It's going to be a long journey. She says. Children don't disappear, and these questions will become more difficult [as they get older]. She added that she was uncertain how she would deal with the future of her son's decision to go to seminary, and added that his son echoed the sentiment of Utah dad Chris Meyer, an altar server. His son expressed an interest in becoming a priest, and if he had to follow, Meyer would be all honest and excited. The Church desperately needs renewal and needs to start. But whatever the seminary he wanted to go to, we would scrutinize it very closely.
